Room in New York

They had come home early from their night out, which they had spent at a fancy Japanese restaurant. They were having dinner with Solomon Barber, Marcos father, a few weeks after Marco finally met his father for the first time. After this first encounter Kitty insisted that she wanted to meet Solomon, too. So they set up a date and time. In the beginning it was a nice evening. They had something nice to eat and while they enjoyed their dessert, they started a conversation. And that is where the problems began. First they talked about ordinary things, but somehow they ended on one especially tricky topic: Kitty's pregnancy.

Marco and his father were both excited about the fact that Kitty was carrying Marco's child, but Kitty started to protest and tried to make it clear, that she did not want this child at the moment. After a short argument Marco and Kitty excused themselves and went home.

Now they were sitting in the living room, while an uncomfortable silence settled down on them. Kitty was frustrated, that Marco couldn't understand her reasons for not having the child and so she tinkled away on the piano. At the same time Marco was reading the newspaper, lost in his own train of thoughts and didn't notice her frustration, although it was pretty obvious. After some minutes Kitty stood up and snatched the paper out of Marco's hand, looking rather annoyed. Marco returned this with a look of disapproval. They started arguing again, yelling and reproaching at each other for not understanding the other.

„It is my life, Marco. And I don't want this child, not now.“ Kitty was seething now.

„You are selfish“, Marco replied.

„Maybe I am, but so are you“, Kitty sneered at him.

Then she turned around and left the room. Marco looked at the closed door, stunned. Then he went to the window and closed it.

The End.
